The Lightroom 5 user interface is extremely clean, so much so that it's one of the simplest ones available. It's very similar to what The Gimp looks like as well. It's also been made less complex by removing what could be deemed "helper screens" that may impede accessibility, like the Open File screen and Smart Preview. I actually got used to it. There's also a great collection of presets that can cater to a wide range of image types. Although there are a handful of complaining users who are dissatisfied with Lightroom, I don't think it deserves the reputation that it has. Lightroom 4 was the first version to get a major overhaul, and Lightroom 5 updates that greatly. There are areas that can be improved, but it's very unlikely that Lightroom will ever move from the 4th position in popularity. Not to mention, it's one of the most popular photo editor packages in the world. There is a whole library of international plug-ins, and a list of presets that helps get incredible results in only one click. If you're a longtime user, you may not find all the new features useful, but certainly they're great if you're new to Lightroom. This is a reference in a lot of ways. Lightroom is as usable today as it was before it was bought out of the Adobe family by Nik Software in 2008. Now, let's take a quick look at the new features that have been added. Lightroom 5 is a big update, and not to mention, a world of difference from how Lightroom 4 was when it first came out. Actually, it's pretty much what Lightroom 3 was last year. It adds more granular control, and includes a new RAW converter and shared storage. What else is new? Well, there's a new face washer effect, along with a whole collection of other new presets available to the user.
